Rose Care

PLANTING: Roses like sun for at least one-third of the day, and air movement although they dislike strong winds. Deep digging helps drainage and aeration and loosens the soil for easy root penetration. Mix in Oderings Compost to improve the condition of the soil and add a handful or two of Oderings 'Blood & Bone'. Dig the hole large enough to create a mound in the bottom so that the roots can be spread over it, and ensure it is deep enough for the graft to sit just above the soil. Do not apply any other fertiliser at this stage as direct contact with fertiliser can kill tender new roots. Remember to keep your rose well-watered for the first six months as it becomes established.

PRUNING: Rose flowers are produced on new season's growth. The later you prune the faster the regrowth and sealing of the wounds. As a guideline prune between one-third and half of the growth on bush roses and half of the growth for floribunda. Remove all spindly, weak or intertwining branches, especially those that rub up against one another or are too crowded. You should aim for 3-5 healthy canes per plant. Standard roses are cut in the same manner as bush roses, cutting each stem to an outward growth to maintain a beautiful shape. Climbing roses are pruned quite differently; you can prune lightly in winter and give them their main pruning after flowering (spring/summer), removing old and dead canes and shortening what remains.

SPRAYING: Spraying your roses and the ground around your roses is essential to keeping them healthy. For a more in depth understanding of spraying please see our brochure 'Winter Spraying'.

FERTILISER: Winter is the optimum time to throw some garden lime or dolomite lime around existing roses to keep your soil sweet, but do not apply any other fertilisers until mid-August, as the plants cannot use it while they are dormant. After August add half a cup of fertiliser to each rose and reapply at three monthly intervals (excluding winter).
